About Beihang University

Beihang University (also known as BUAA) was founded in 1952, with the merger of the aeronautical departments from eight top Chinese universities. With this it became the first university focused on aeronautics and astronautics in China and was recognized as one of China's 16 key universities. From that time on the government of China has made support of Beihang University a priority. The university is currently a member of a very select group of top Chinese universities supported by the 985 National Education Excellence Project, which aims to develop world-class universities in China.

At present, Beihang has over 26,000 students. 13,000 of them are undergraduates while the rest are postgraduates. These also include 1200 international students from over 80 countries. All courses at Beihang University at the postgraduate level can be given in English.

Beihang University - one of the most renowned universities in China – is equipped with advanced laboratories and teaching facilities. The university campus is located close to Beijing's High-Tech Park area – Zhongguancun Science Park and it is noted for its attractive environment, convenient location and comprehensive services to support the needs of students.
